Page 2 of 2 -- But it found Massachusetts would incur much greater social costs, up to $228 million, because it estimated that three-quarters of the casino's patrons would be from here. The combined social costs for both states would exceed the revenue generated by the casino by about $69 million, the study found.

"The study casts a bright light on the reality of this industry," said Les Bernal, former aide to Massachusetts senator Susan C. Tucker and currently director of a national group trying to prevent the industry's expansion.

"This proposal is a something-for-nothing scheme," Bernal said. "Taxpayers are going to pay, regardless of whether they play."

In its findings, the Center for Public Policy Studies acknowledged that calculating social costs is an emerging field and that there is widespread disagreement over the methodology used. Quantifying some costs, such as impact of pathological gambling on families, is also difficult, the center said.

The center used previously established research models to estimate how many people would become problem gamblers with the opening of a new casino and what the effect would be on the government, families, and businesses. For example, the study used data from the University of Chicago to calculate that the arrest of a problem gambler would cost the government $299.

The Massachusetts House and Senate commissioned reports on the economic impacts of expanded gambling, but the reports made only passing references to social costs. They did not attempt to tabulate those costs, to show how much they would detract from the economic benefits.

The Senate hired The Innovation Group, a Colorado-based gambling research firm, for its analysis. Rosenberg and others used the report to support their conclusion that three casinos would create about 14,000 permanent jobs and yield $360 million to $460 million for the state. Innovation Group did not attempt to estimate gambling's cost, but asserted that devoting 5 percent of revenues to addiction-related services and community costs would be enough to cover those expenses.

Some senators opposed to expanded gambling have questioned the firm's objectivity, saying its clients also include some of the world's largest casino developers, including Harrah's Entertainment Inc., Wynn Resorts, and Trump Hotels & Casinos. A spokeswoman for The Innovation Group declined to comment.

Rosenberg said the lack of cost estimates in the Senate report does not mean those impacts were not studied. He said he and his colleagues went to great lengths to research potential costs and determine how to offset them. For example, Rosenberg traveled to Quebec to talk with officials about a $25 million program to combat problem gambling, one of the highest amounts allocated for such purposes in the world.

"They found they could not effectively spend $25 million," Rosenberg said. "We have answered all these questions, and built our answers into our legislation to ensure that we do as good or better than anyone else in mitigating the social and economic impacts."
